Those who are engaged in social work should have a competent base for their procedures. Professional skills need professional as well as scientifically based working rules. For those in practice, as well as for students, the tools for planning and evaluating their work is often lacking and a particular method of doing things is generally chosen by intuition. Why this is then the correct procedure for an individual situation is not necessarily clear. Methodical procedures, however, mean that work is systematically planned and reflected upon. It spans a bridge between scientific theory and practice. This book is an important companion for those studying and practising social work.
